
While this blog post is littered with obscenities, it is nothing but the truth. Despite our best efforts to hide personal information, hackers are getting smarter and harder to stop. As their share of the market increases, the risk of having your identity stolen or data stolen rises. If you don't want your online business to be clogged with spammy advertisements (or worse), you need protection in place! Be proactive and protect yourself by signing up for one of these subscription plans I've found in today's article. I found this video of a speech by James Taggart at the American Society of Mechanical Engineers (ASME) in the year 2009. The content is still relevant even today. It's all about security and personal safety on social media. There is also a link to download his book which provides you with practical information to protect your online presence and business ventures: <http://www.automationandtheirtype.com/social-media-security.html> By James Taggart Automation, Control & Instrumentation LinkedIn Twitter

There are many people who would like to make money working at home using the internet. By working at home, you can make your own schedule, not having to worry about getting permission from someone else in order to leave early or take time off. From what I've seen, these people generally fall under one of two categories; those who are selling something, and the others who are looking for a better job. You probably already know that there are several different types of digital cameras on the market. Each of them is designed to handle different types of situations, depending on their price range. One type which has only recently started to become popular is the compact camera. These are small in size but can take very good photos, with some models even being able to take HD video. If you are looking for a camera for fun or just taking snapshots then they are certainly worth thinking about. By James Taggart Automation, Control & Instrumentation LinkedIn

Losing a loved one is a very traumatic experience that most people would prefer to avoid. The last thing that a grieving family member or friend wants to deal with is having to deal with all the legalities involved in estate planning. Deceased loved ones now have the option of leaving their assets to those they would want as beneficiaries or naming a contingent beneficiary as opposed to outright giving everything away. In this article, we will explore how beneficiary designations can help you make these decisions after you lose a loved one's race.
